Keep That Sense of Wonder

Dear Member,

Another year is drawing to a close. It's time to take stock, give thanks for the good that's happened in 2016, and make plans for an even better 2017.

In this issue, we celebrate our sense of wonder as human beings: Is it possible that ancient people from thousands of years ago already knew about electricity? Could YouTube be the new "idiot box" or is it something good? How did nature make her own skyscrapers?

Questions like these open our minds to possibilities, and open minds are minds that are able to learn and take advantage of new opportunities that come our way. So, as we end the year and celebrate the holiday season, let's also celebrate the wonders of the human mind and the world around us.

Besides the very interesting knowledge and lifestyle articles we have prepared for you, this quarter's newsletter will also keep you informed of the news, reports and exciting promotions that we have created especially for you.

Please enjoy your read, open your mind to wonder, and be inspired about how you can celebrate the year's end with family fun, dining and sports with us. And as always, I'll see you down at the club!

Yours faithfully,

Khor Poh Waa

Baghdad Battery:

ANCIENT ELECTRICITY

Have you heard of the “Baghdad battery”? The riddle of this ancient artefact has baffled historians for decades. Discovered in the 1930s, the Baghdad battery consists of a terracotta jar with a tube of copper and an iron rod in its centre, three specimens of which were unearthed.

While working in Khujut Rabu, a settlement of Parthian people in Baghdad, which lies in modern-day Iraq, German archaeologist Wilhelm König stumbled upon a 13 cm tall clay urn. Inside this urn was a copper cylinder, and within the cylinder was an iron rod. The clay showed signs of corrosion, and initial tests indicated that the urn was used to hold an acidic substance like vinegar or wine.

From its structure, König was convinced that the jar was an ancient battery. This hypothesis was controversial then and now, because electricity was thought not to be known to humankind until the modern age. Unfortunately, before König could investigate further, war broke out and his discovery was forgotten. It would be years later before his discovery would be revisited again.

Dr St. John Simpson of the British Museum disputed König's theory

▶ Archaeology Battery Controversy

König placed the objects in the Parthian period (250 BC – AD 224), but Dr St. John Simpson of the British Museum disputed König's theory. Simpson judged the style of the pots to be of Sassanid dating (about AD 225) and disputed the origin of König's excavation.

Archaeologists were divided over König's ancient battery theory, since there is no definite record of what these jars were or how they were used. Thus, any attempt at understanding how these jars might have worked as batteries would involve some conjecture.

The kneejerk reaction to the so-called Baghdad battery is that modern scientists believe that electricity was discovered only in recent times, and ancient people would have had no knowledge of how to use it. But what if the ancient people of Iraq knew how to use electricity even without fully understanding how it worked? For example, ancient civilisations knew the effective use of herbs, even without understanding the principles of chemistry and biology that undergirds the medicinal use of plants.

► How It Might Have Worked as a Battery

Proponents of the ancient battery theory believe that lemon juice, vinegar, wine or grape juice was used as an acidic electrolyte to generate electricity within the battery. Nobody knows for sure why ancient Persians who lived in Baghdad at that time would need to generate electricity. Guesses ranging from electricity being used as a painkilling therapy to being used for electroplating devices, have been floated by experts. König theorised that gold-plated silver artefacts found in ancient Iraq were in fact electroplated using these kinds of ancient batteries as sources of electrical energy.

Aside from the debate and conjecture around the Baghdad battery urns, modern reproduction models of the artefacts have been shown to be capable of generating an electrical current. Various replicas have been able to generate from 0.8 to 2.0 volts, comparable with a modern day disposable battery.

► In Conclusion: No Conclusion

In spite of the many arguments for and against the ancient battery theory, nothing conclusive has yet been agreed upon. The mystery continues, and it may yet one day be solved conclusively – perhaps if ancient computers, television sets or mobile phones are dug up by archaeologists in the future.

From Idiot Box to YouTube ?

The world was changed forever on 14 February 2005, when two friends who were then working at PayPal developed a video-sharing website as a side project. Chad Hurley and Steve Chen developed what would become YouTube, which went live in October 2006.

In a few short years, YouTube has become the number-one website for video sharing, and the third-most visited website of any kind. It has transformed video consumption and television viewing habits, threatening to knock the “idiot box” off its throne. Besides consumers switching to their computers instead of watching their TVs, YouTube has also invaded the living room through Smart TVs and multimedia PCs that stream content to the large screen.

The question remains, though, is this an advancement in civilisation, or have we replaced the “idiot box” with the “idiot flat screen”?

Good: Abundance of Regular New Content

YouTube alleviates the boredom of a television line-up. Besides watching a series of video episodes, you can allow YouTube to feed you a recommended diet of videos that might interest you. YouTube learns what interests you, as you use it. This machine-learning feature, plus the millions of YouTubers who together upload more than a days' worth of video every minute, means that you will always find something novel and interesting to watch.

Good: Watch When You Want

YouTube frees you from the tyranny of the TV schedule. No longer do you have to work your appointments around your favourite TV shows. Now you can sit down at your leisure and have news and entertainment on demand. You can watch what you want, when you want.

Good: Skippable Ads

It's hard to remember the days when you would endure commercial breaks that went on for a few minutes. YouTube ads are skippable after the first 5 seconds. This is good news for the viewer as well as the advertiser. The viewer does not have to suffer through long TV commercials of no interest to them, and the advertiser gets feedback on which ads work and which ads don't.

This way, advertisers are able to create commercials that actually reach their audience, and viewers get to enjoy their content more. Even more, favourite ads can actually be watched again and again on their own YouTube channels. Everybody wins!

Bad: Just About Anyone Can Upload a Video

YouTube is an open platform, and anyone can upload a video. While this is good for creativity and freedom of speech, it also means that videos of dubious factual quality, low production values and intentionally offensive content does make its way onto the platform.

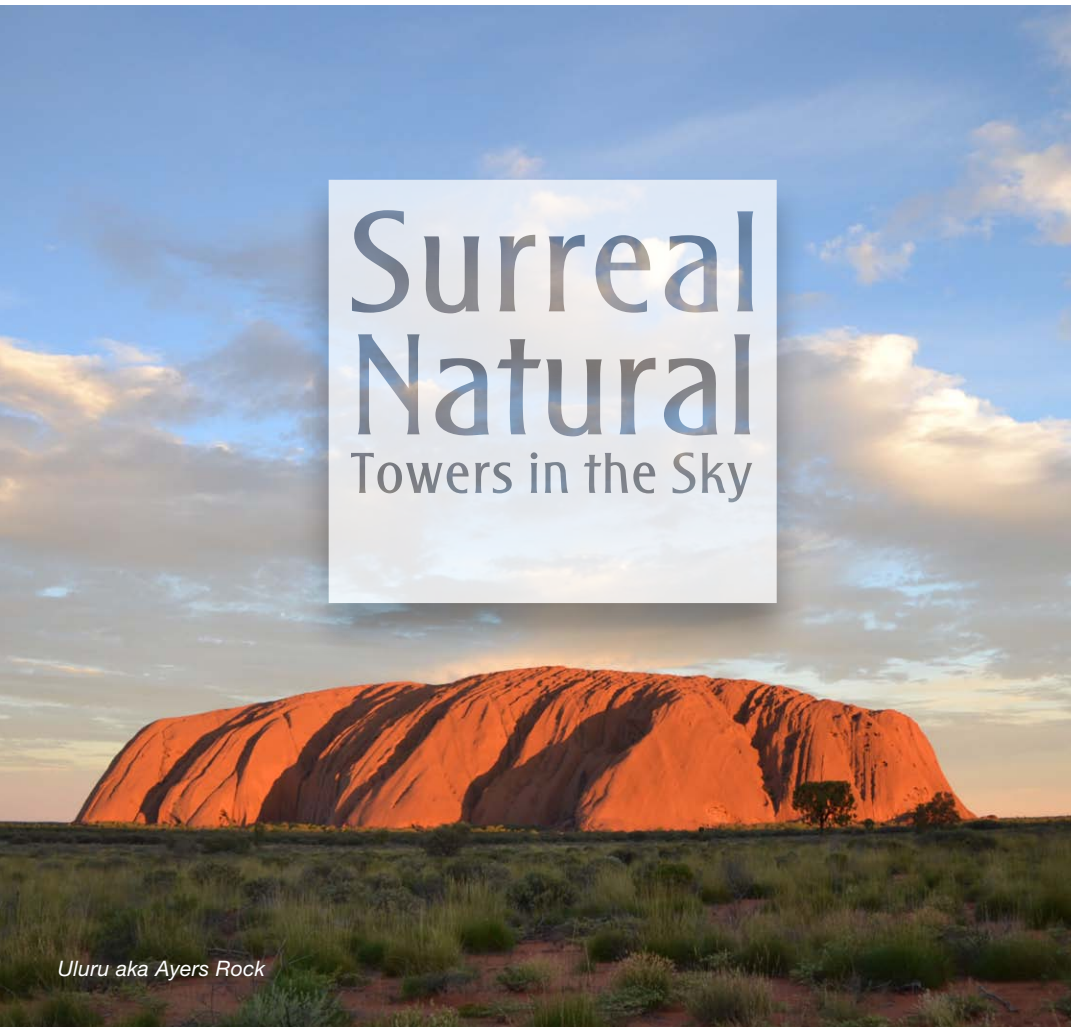

Bad: It's the Wild, Wild West

In true internet fashion, YouTube began its life with practically zero regulation, meaning that pirated content, animal cruelty and other horrific content could make its way through.

Today, YouTube is much better regulated both by YouTube itself through its human employees and computer algorithms, as well as by users who flag harmful content for review.

Not So Bad After All

Taking into consideration the fact that YouTube provides today's consumer with virtually limitless choice of content and the convenience of watching anytime and anywhere, plus the fact that it continually improves its ability to catch and filter harmful content, we'd have to conclude that YouTube is a nett benefit to man, woman and child. Wouldn't you agree?

Surreal
Natural
Towers in the Sky

Uluru aka Ayers Rock

Manmade skyscrapers are the emblem of today's urban-centric, post-industrial epoch. Yet, before recorded history, nature already had its own skyscrapers. These monoliths of stone were formed by eons of geological activity, have stood since time immemorial, and will still be standing after our last skyscraper has eroded to the ground. Each of these monoliths is an awe-inspiring sight that inspires any visitor to look up to the sky and contemplate the infinite wonder of the universe in contrast to our seemingly small presence within it.

Uluru aka Ayers Rock

This massive, towering rock resides in central Australia and is surrounded by many caves and natural bodies of water. Within the caves are innumerable paintings from prehistory, as Uluru is considered sacred ground by the native Australian aborigines.

Estimated to be about 600 million years old, Uluru stands an immense 348 m above ground. Its distinct and unusual reddish brown colour comes from the oxidation on the surface of its rock that is high in iron content. Experts surmise that this monolith was formed due to the erosion of a massive granite mountain that resulted in the remaining formation

Zuma Rock

Sugarloaf Mountain

Sigiriya

surrounded by a sandy residue known as arkose.

Zuma Rock

Zuma Rock was formed many geological eras ago through what is known as an intrusion process, which resulted in two types of rock, namely, gabbro and granodiorite. Located in Nigeria, this rock stands 725 m above ground and is one of the most popular tourist attractions in the country.

Amazingly, its formation features natural contours that make it resemble a human face. A calm, peaceful atmosphere pervades around the vicinity of Zuma Rock, making it a popular destination for camping and recreation.

Sugarloaf Mountain

This 396-metre-high monolith

is found in Brazil, and is so named because it resembles the shape of a refined sugarloaf. It's what is known to geologists as a metamorphic rock, which was formed due to repeated climatic changes such as air pressure and temperature that over time shaped the rock into its interesting shape.

Enterprising locals have built a cableway that stretches across the distance, through which visitors may take in the beautiful scenery around the mountain while riding in cable cars high up in the sky.

Sigiriya

Standing 200m above ground, Sigiriya in Sri Lanka can be described as a natural rock fortress. According to geological analysis, Sigiriya was formed due to a volcanic eruption, when the emerging lava cooled and formed numerous mountains, the largest of which became Sigiriya.

Today, it remains one of the most visited tourist locations in the country, as it remains very well preserved in its historical state. Visitors to this monolith will pass through an old gateway sculpted in the form of a lion. This ancient site is festooned with many beautiful frescoes that have been carved since by previous civilisations.

Take a break from the urban jungle and take a walk around these majestic monoliths of mother nature. Climb them if you can. It will prove to be an adventure unlike any that manmade skyscrapers can provide.

GOLF: A SPORT WITH AN UNCLEAR ANCIENT ORIGIN

Everybody knows that golf originated in Scotland, right? In fact, the ancient origins of golf are not so direct. Tracing the origins of the game is like trying to determine where the rainbow changes from yellow to green. While you might study the colours of the rainbow keenly, you can never find a definitive line where one colour changes into another. You will only find a gradual change in the spectrum, from one hue to the next. Such is it, when trying to find the true beginning of golf. The game was not invented in a day. Instead, it evolved in fits and starts over more than 5,000 years.

▶ While Shepherds Watched Their Flocks

Some historians time the beginning of golf to a game that bored shepherds used to play. To pass the time, they would hit pebbles and rocks as far as they could, with the slender rods that shepherds commonly used to guide their flocks. At first, they competed to see who could hit the rock the farthest. And then, a target was added to the game.

► Here Come the Dutch

The Dutch also lay claim to the invention of golf. They had a 13th century sport that resembled golf, and was known as het kolven. Interestingly, during this era, Holland and Scotland were involved in heavy trade with each other. This might explain why both countries have claimed to be the inventors of the game. However, it's impossible to know who influenced whom first.

► The Flying Scotsmen

Nevertheless, most people hold that the modern game of golf originated in Scotland, in the vicinity of Edinburgh. During those days, people would strike a stone around tracks and over sand dunes found in the countryside, using a club or bent stick.

When Scotland was faced with an imminent threat of invasion, the King found that most able-bodied men were more interested in the game than in engaging in their military duties. Thus, in 1457, the Scottish parliament under King James II outlawed the sport. This historical fact indicates how popular and widespread the game was among Scotsmen of that era.

The ban was almost impossible to enforce, as it goes, and decades later, the ban was lifted by King James IV, who also became the first king to engage in the sport. With this royal endorsement, the game began to spread rapidly in popularity, even spilling over to other European countries, including England and France.

► Swinging into Modern History

One of the most popular golf courses in those days was located in Leith, near Edinburgh. It was on this golf course that the first golf competition in history was held, in 1682. It was recorded that John Patersone and the Duke of York beat two English noblemen, on that historic occasion.

In 1744, a club calling themselves the Gentlemen Golfers of Leith was formed (later to become known as the Honourable Company of Edinburgh Golfers) and wrote is now the earliest surviving Rules of Golf. The club set up annual matches to be played with the 1744 rules. And that is how the modern game of golf comes to us today.

Nasi Lemak:

Perennial Malaysian Favourite

The first recorded mention of nasi lemak was in a book by Sir Richard Winstedt written in 1909. Beyond that, however, no one knows for sure how long it has been in existence. Today, nasi lemak is available everywhere in Malaysia and we all tend to take it for granted.

From its origins on the Malayan peninsula, this dish of rich flavours has spread around the region and is enjoyed natively in some form, in Indonesia, Thailand, the Philippines and Singapore. Even within Malaysia, slight variations to the dish have been introduced over the years through the influence of the country's diverse communities. Thus every Malaysian has his or her favourite style of the dish – but what really makes a good nasi lemak? Let's take a moment to celebrate this delectable Malaysian staple.

Getting back to basics

In order to understand what makes nasi lemak good, we must first understand what makes it nasi lemak in the first place. In its basic form, nasi lemak is a fragrant rice dish prepared by steaming rice with pandan leaf and coconut milk. Its name is a nod to the cream derived from the coconut – nasi lemak can be translated as “cream-infused rice”. The resulting fragrant rice is served with sambal, which is a thick, spicy hot sauce made from chillies and other spices. Add to this the basic ingredients, we learn to look for the quality of its rice, the fragrance of the coconut milk, the spiciness of the sambal and the freshness of the ikan bilis and groundnuts – which you can tell by the way they crunch. These are the fundamentals of a good nasi lemak experience.

a sprinkling of crispy fried ikan bilis (small anchovies) and crunchy groundnuts plus a few slices of cool cucumber, and you have the delicious basic nasi lemak that's simply to die for.

► A breakfast dish for any time of the day

With its roots in Malay culture, nasi lemak was traditionally a breakfast dish. In fact, it was immortalised in a recent Time magazine article as one of the few recommended “healthiest breakfasts” from around the world.

Nasi lemak, however, has broken out of the breakfast hours and become a favoured meal throughout the day, which is a testament to the outright yumminess of this dish. In present-day fashion, nasi lemak serves as a base for scrumptious protein servings such as fried chicken (“ayam goreng”), dry beef curry (“daging rendang”), chilli cuttlefish (“sambal sotong”) and fried cockles (“kerang goreng”). Popular vegetable accompaniments include a pickled vegetable salad known as acar, and stir-fried water convolvulus (“kangkung”).

► What makes it good

So, what makes a good nasi lemak? From understanding

On top of these, the quality of ingredients and skill of preparation of the accompanying servings such as the aforementioned fried chicken, beef rendang and so on, are up to individual preference. But one thing most Malaysians can agree on: it should be hot and spicy!

When it comes to any Carlsberg Golf Classic, the registration forms are always snapped up in just a couple of days. What's more, with only 108 slots allocated, the rolls are always jam-packed, with many on the waiting list.

As the sun made its way over the horizon, 108 golfers gathered bright and early at the Hole 18 green for a group photo before proceeding to their respective tee-boxes.

Special Needs Children Compete In RDA-Bukit Kiara's 12th Annual Gymkhana

11 October 2016

RDA at Bukit Kiara (RDA-Bukit Kiara), a branch of RDA Malaysia, was founded in 1994 by Bukit Kiara Resort Berhad and some of its equestrian members. A trust fund was set up for the running of the voluntary programme, which is managed by a Board of Trustees. RDA-Bukit Kiara is a truly co-operative effort between the Bukit Kiara Equestrian and Country Resort (BKECR) and volunteers, many of whom are riding members of the club. The club provides use of horses and ponies from its Riding School as well as the use of its facilities for RDA activities. Our special needs children come from the Selangor Spastic Centre, Taman Tun Dr Ismail Primary School (Special Education Class) and Emmanuel School.

At RDA-Bukit Kiara, we have consistently organised an annual gymkhana, with the 12th to be held on 11 October 2016. A gymkhana is an event comprising competitions on horseback. There has been tremendous support from the riders, their families and schools; the management of BKECR; and staff of the Equestrian as well as Grounds Departments. We also receive contributions in cash and kind from organisations and individuals that go a long way in making our annual gymkhana a success. As has been the practice, all riders will receive gifts while competition winners will get something extra.

Mission Accomplished: All Greens Returfed!

27 August 2016

Great news for our avid golfers and club members – our green returfing project has been completed! As of now, all 18 holes have had their greens returfed. This will be welcome news to all golfers, as this means much improved green play for all of you.

As part of our commitment to providing the best facilities for our club members, we undertook this returfing project four months ago to refurbish our beloved golf course that had served us so well. Over those months, our members had been patient as our holes were returfed in phases. Now, all that waiting has paid off with a golf course that's virtually brand new!

We invite all members to enjoy using the golf course with its beautiful new greens today. Please note that some of the grass may still have a yellow tint because of the culture practice process. This is normal, does not affect game play, and a lush green hue will return in the course of time. It's time to tee off!
